Homily

Once a man was riding a galloping horse. As the horse and rider thundered past, an old farmer standing by the gate called out, 'Where are you going?' Don't ask me, ask the horse,' the man yelled as he flashed by. The man on horseback stands for the person whose life consists of non-stop activity. Such a person is not free; he is a slave to his work. But his problem goes deeper. He is not in control of his life. It's as if some power has got into him that is driving him along. This is not a good way to live. People can get so caught up in work that they haven't a minute for themselves. Activity can become a disease. This is a dangerous situation. People can suffer burn-out or breakdown. Generous people are more at risk than selfish people. We need to take care of ourselves. It can't be all out-put and no in-put. Only by paying careful attention to our physical, emotional, mental and spiritual needs can we remain joyful givers.
